STATEMENT OF THE CASE 3

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT 4

1.(a) This Court has not yet determined the important constitutional question whether a motion for reduction of sentence is a "critical stage" of a criminal prosecution requiring appointment of counsel. The Court of Appeals' decision denying the constitutional right to appointed counsel at this stage is not in accord with this Court's whole series of right-to-counsel decisions . . . 4

(b) This Court has not yet determined whether the federal Criminal Justice Act or Court Rules provide a right to appointment of counsel for a reduction-of-sentence motion. The Court of Appeals' decision denying such a right is contrary to the well-established construction given the Act by the Administrative Office of the United United States Courts, which is the agency charged with implementation of the Act. 7

2. Petitioner Burrell also has a due-process right to counsel, because his motion to reduce sentence raised substantial claims of post-sentencing rehabilitation, education, good prison behavior, availability of a work-release job, and that he would be eligible for work-release only if his sentence were reduced. The Court of Appeals' decision, refusing to recognize this right to counsel and holding that post-sentencing rehabilitation et alia are not relevant considerations, misconstrues and misapplies this Court's decision in Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973) and other cases. 10

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Respondent.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS

The petitioner, Beine J. Burrell, respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment and opinion of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, entered in this case on January 30, 1975.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals below is reported at 332A.2d 344 (1975). No opinion was rendered by the District of Columbia Superior Court. Its order and the Court of Appeals' opinion and judgment are printed in Appendix A hereto.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals Court was entered on January 30, 1975. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. 1257(3).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether an indigent, imprisoned defendant, who requests appointment of counsel, is entitled thereto on his motion for reduction of sentence, either (a) under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments or (b) under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. 3006A (1970), or Court Rules.

2. Whether, as a matter of due process, counsel should have been appointed in this case, where petitioner Burrell's pro se motion to reduce sentence raised substantial claims of post-sentencing rehabilitation, education, good prison behavior, availability of a work-release job, and eligibility for work-release only if his sentence were reduced.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS, STATUTES AND RULES INVOLVED

The Constitutional provisions involved are the due-process clause of the Fifth Amendment and the right-to-counsel clause of the Sixth Amendment. The statute involved is the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. 3006A (1970). The Court Rules involved are Rule 35(a), D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rules (identical to Federal Criminal Rule 35), and Rule 44, D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rules, substantially identical to Federal Criminal Rule 44(a). The relevant provisions are printed in Appendix B hereto.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Petitioner Burrell was convicted in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia of possessing a pistol without a license, in violation of D.C. Code, §22-3204. He was sentenced to a term of imprisonment of one to three years, to run consecutively to another sentence previously imposed. Petitioner Burrell appealed, but then voluntarily dismissed his appeal on his own motion on October 12, 1972. Thereafter and within the 120 days required by Rule 35(a) of the D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rules (identical to Federal Criminal Rule 35), petitioner filed a pro se motion for reduction of sentence, together with supporting pro se papers. Accompanying this pro se motion was petitioner Burrell's letter to the court stating in part:

> "I do not have a lawyer, and I would like to have a lawyer appointed to represent me for this Motion."

The trial court ignored this request and denied the motion without a hearing and without stating any grounds for its refusal to appoint Counsel.

Petitioner appealed to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. The court rejected petitioner Burrell's claim to have a Constitutional right to appointed counsel at the motion-for-reduction-of-sentence stage of the criminal proceeding against him. The D.C. Court of Appeals went on to hold that petitioner Burrell had no right to appointed counsel under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. 3006A (1970), or Court Rules, on his motion for reduction of sentence.

The Court of Appeals acknowledged a due-process right to appointed counsel where the sentence-reduction motion raises "relevant" considerations (without specifying what considerations it might consider relevant). But the court held that "Such post-sentencing developments" as "rehabilitation and good prison behavior," as well as education, availability of a work-release job, and eligibility for work-release only if his sentence were reduced, "are not considerations relevant to sentencing" but are "more appropriately considerations for the Board of Parole . . ." 332 A.2d at 346.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

1.(a) This Court has not yet Determined the Important Constitutional Question Whether a Motion for Reduction of Sentence is a "Critical Stage" of a Criminal Prosecution Requiring Appointment of Counsel. The Court of Appeals' Decision Denying the Constitutional Right to Appointed Counsel at this Stage is not in Accord With This Court's Whole Series of Right-to-Counsel Decisions.

This Court has held that the indigent defendant in a criminal case "requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him" (Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 69 (1932)) and has the right, under the Sixth Amendment, to have counsel appointed for him in every Court in the United States in every criminal case involving the possibility of imprisonment. Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938). This Court has held that the right to appointed counsel applies at preliminary examination (Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970); White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963)); at arraignment (Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52 (1961)); at post-indictment lineup (United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)); at custodial interrogation (Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)); throughout the period from arraignment to trial, (Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)); at initial sentencing (see Townsend v. Burke, 334 U.S. 736 (1948)); at court proceedings for deferred sentencing or revocation of probation ((Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128 (1967)); at the fixing of final sentence (United States v. Behrens, 375 U.S. 162 (1963)); and on initial appeal of right (Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)). This Court held that each of these was a "critical stage" of the criminal proceedings.

This Court has not yet faced the precise issue of whether an indigent defendant is entitled to counsel at a motion to reduce sentence. But, we submit, the whole series of right-to-counsel decisions cited above leaves little doubt that a reduction-of-sentence motion is likewise a "critical stage," because it is a stage of the criminal proceedings at which substantial rights of the accused may be affected. Indeed, the most important right of the accused in the whole criminal-law process, the final adjudication of the right to liberty itself, is involved in the reduction-of-sentence motion.* For "Rule 35 is intended to give every convicted defendant a second round before the sentencing judge, and at the same time, it affords the judge an opportunity to reconsider the sentence in the light of any further information about the defendant or the case which may have been presented to him in the interim." United States v. Ellenbogen, 390 F.2d 537, 543 (2d Cir. 1968).

* Gerstein v. Pugh, ___ U.S. ___, 43 U.S. Law Week 4230, 4235, 4237 (Feb. 18, 1975) involved "only the first stage of an elaborate system." That first stage was a preliminary, non-adversary, probable-cause determination "pending further proceedings", which could be made by a magistrate "either before or promptly after arrest", and which could be promptly reviewed, in adversary proceedings requiring appointed counsel, either on a writ of habeas corpus or at a preliminary hearing, detention hearing, first appearance or adjourned first appearance.

The D.C. Court of Appeals' statement that petitioner Burrell "had run the gamut of the adjudicatory process" (332 A.2d at 345) is obviously incorrect. The Rule 35 reduction-of-sentence motion is addressed to the sentencing judge. It is as much a part of the adjudicatory process, and every defendant has as much right to make such a motion, as he has the right to appeal.

The Court of Appeals' reliance upon Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973), evidently flows from its erroneous categorization of the reduction-of-sentence motion as being outside rather than a part of the adjudicatory process. That reliance is misplaced and leads the Court of Appeals to an unwarranted extension of this Court's holding in Gagnon, as well as an undue restriction on this Court's holdings in the right-to-counsel cases, particularly Mempa v. Rhay, supra. In Gagnon, this Court distinguished Mempa precisely on the grounds that the probation revocation proceeding in Gagnon, unlike that in Mempa, was (1) "not a stage of a criminal prosecution," and (2) was and should remain an informal, administrative proceeding possessing "significant interests in informality, flexibility and economy," rather than a court proceeding. A motion for reduction of sentence is of course a stage of the criminal prosecution, and is of course a formal court proceeding.

What this Court said in Mempa about "the necessity for the aid of counsel in marshaling the facts, introducing evidence of mitigating circumstances and in general aiding and assisting the defendant to present his case as to sentence" (389 U.S. at 135) is of course equally applicable at the stage of a motion for reduction of sentence. In petitioner Burrell's case, counsel, having the necessary skill and mobility, could have obtained affidavits and subpoenaed live witnesses to substantiate Mr. Burrell's claims that, in the opinion of reliable persons in authority at Lorton Reformatory, he was fully rehabilitated; that a good job was waiting for him outside; and that he would be permitted to take that job if but only if his sentence were reduced. In short, counsel could have presented evidence to show a complete change of circumstances, fully justifying a reduced sentence.

(b) This Court has not yet Determined Whether the Federal Criminal Justice Act or Court Rules Provide a Right to Appointment of Counsel for a Reduction-of-Sentence Motion. The Court of Appeals' Decision Denying Such a Right is Contrary to the Well-Established Construction Given the Act by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Which is the Agency Charged with Implementation of the Act.

The Criminal Justice Act provides (18 U.S.C. 3006A (c)):

"A person for whom counsel is appointed shall be represented at every stage of the proceedings from his initial appearance before the United States magistrate or the court through appeal, including ancillary matters appropriate to the proceedings . . ."

And 18 U.S.C. 3006A(d)(2) provides that for "representation in connection with a post-trial motion made after the entry of judgment . . . compensation shall not exceed $250 for each attorney in each proceeding in each court."

Moreover, D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rule 44 (identical to Federal Criminal Rule 44(a) except for omission of the bracketed matter below) provides:

> "Every defendant who is unable to obtain counsel shall be entitled to have counsel assigned to represent him at every stage of the proceedings from his initial appearance before [the Federal magistrate or] the Court [through appeal], unless he waives such appointment."

In this case, the trial court duly appointed counsel for petitioner Burrell at the time of his initial appearance, and that counsel represented him through the filing of notice of appeal from his conviction. Thereafter the Court of Appeals duly appointed the undersigned counsel to represent him in that court. But after the case returned to the trial court following dismissal of that appeal on his own motion, the trial court simply ignored his request for appointment of counsel to represent him in connection with his post-appeal motion for reduction of sentence.

The Court of Appeals, grasping upon the phrase "through appeal," may have construed §3006A(c) "[not] to require the appointment of counsel to assist in the preparation of a post-appeal motion for a reduction of sentence" (332 A.2d at 347; emphasis added), although leaving it open that §3006A may require such appointment prior to appeal. There are a number of defects in such a construction. (1) This restrictive construction ignores the Congressional intent that the statute should be applied and construed liberally in favor of the right to appointed counsel. (2) This construction leads to the absurd result that an indigent defendant who wins on appeal the right to retrial or rehearing would not be entitled to counsel at these post-appeal stages of the criminal proceedings. (3) This construction ignores and is irreconcilable with the specific reference in §3006A(d)(2) to "representation [by appointed counsel] in connection with a post-trial motion made after the entry of judgment." (4) This construction ignores the omission of the phrase "through appeal" in D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rule 44. (5) This construction creates an invidious and wholly arbitrary discrimination against those indigents whose reduction-of-sentence motions are filed post-appeal rather than after conviction but before or in lieu of appeal. Thus, this construction is to be avoided because, so construed, the statute would be of doubtful constitutionality under due-process, equal-protection principles.

Finally, this construction is wholly inconsistent with and contrary to the uniform and well-established construction given to the statute both by the District of Columbia's Criminal Justice Act Administrator and by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. Those offices have adopted and they regularly and uniformly act upon the position that an attorney who represents an indigent on a motion for reduction of sentence is entitled to compensation under the Criminal Justice Act, without regard to whether the motion is made post-appeal or is made post-conviction but before or in lieu of appeal. In light of this consistent administrative practice, and in light of the short 120-day period within which a reduction-of-sentence motion may be made, explicit recognition by this Court of the right to appointed counsel for the reduction-of-sentence motion can be expected to result in only minimal, if any, increase in cost and in judicial and lawyers' time. Such increase as there may be will help to implement the American Bar Association's Criminal Justice Standards on The Defense Function, that "the role of counsel [at sentencing] has been slighted in the past and ought to be expanded" and that "Defense counsel should present to the Court . . . all favorable information relevant to sentencing and . . . be prepared to suggest a program of rehabilitation based on his exploration of employment, educational and other opportunities made available by community services." (1970, p. 285 and §8.1(b).)

2. Petitioner Burrell also has a Due-Process Right to Counsel, Because his Motion to Reduce Sentence Raised Substantial Claims of Post-Sentencing Rehabilitation, Education, Good Prison Behavior, Availability of a Work-Release Job, and that he Would be Eligible for Work-Release Only if his Sentence were Reduced. The Court of Appeals' Decision, Refusing to Recognize this Right to Counsel and Holding that Post-Sentencing Rehabilitation et Alia are not Relevant Considerations, Misconstrues and Misapplies this Court's Decision in Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973) and Other Cases.

Despite its heavy (but, as we have shown in part 1(a) above, misplaced) reliance upon Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973), in rejecting petitioner Burrell's sixth-amendment and statutory rights to appointed counsel, the Court of Appeals has failed to follow even Gagnon's basic, minimal, due-process standards. This Court's opinion in Gagnon states (411 U.S. at 791):

> "In every case in which a request for counsel . . . is refused, the grounds for refusal should be stated succinctly in the record."

Here, the trial court's brief, pro forma order failed even to mention petitioner Burrell's request for appointment of counsel, much less state grounds for its refusal.

The Court of Appeals sought to remedy this fatal deficiency by holding that "such post-sentencing developments" as "rehabilitation and good prison behavior," educational training while in prison, availability of a work-release job and "that he is prevented from realizing the foregoing 'only because his sentence in this case is to run consecutively to his previous sentence' " (332A.2d at 345) all are "not considerations relevant to sentencing." (332A.2d at 346). This holding flies in the face of the court's own approving quotation from The Policies and Standards for Sentencing adopted by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals (27 F.R.D. 390), that:

> "A proper sentence is a composite of many factors, including . . . the prospects for the rehabilitation of the offender, the possibility of a return of the offender to a normal life in the community, [and] the possibility . . . of training of the offender . . ."

Moreover, this holding is directly contrary to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals' statement in United States v. Ellenbogen, 390 F.2d 537, 543 (1968), that:

> "Rule 35 . . . affords the judge an opportunity to reconsider the sentence in light of any further information about the defendant or the case which may have been presented to him in the interim."

In addition the D.C. Court of Appeals' holding completely ignores and is contrary to this Court's recognition, in North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 723 (1969), that sentencing judges have great freedom "to consider the defendant's conduct subsequent to the first conviction in imposing a new sentence" after retrial, and to resentence "in the light of events subsequent to the first trial that may have thrown new light upon the defendant's 'life, health, habits, conduct, and mental and moral propensities.' "

The D.C. Court of Appeals' argument that post-sentencing developments, such as rehabilitation, educational training and job opportunities, are somehow "not relevant" on a reduction-of-sentence motion simply because they happen to be "appropriately considerations for the Board of Parole" (332 A.2d at 346) is of course a non-sequitur. This Court answered such an argument over forty years ago, in United States v. Benz, 282 U.S. 304, 311 (1931):

> "We find nothing in the suggestion that the action of the district court in reducing the punishment after the prisoner had served a part of the imprisonment originally imposed was a usurpation of the pardoning power of the executive. The judicial power and the executive power over sentences are readily distinguishable. To render judgment is a judicial function. To carry the judgment into effect is an executive function. To cut short a sentence by an act of clemency is an exercise of executive power which abridges the enforcement of the judgment, but does not alter it qua judgment. To reduce a sentence by amendment alters the terms of the judgment itself and is a judicial act as much as the imposition of the sentence in the first instance."

Finally, the D.C. Court of Appeals' suggestion that sentencing judges may not reduce sentences because of post-sentencing developments would require judges to blind themselves to what all the rest of the world knows.

It would require them to act on the basis of what they know to be untruths. Such a doctrine is so far removed from accepted and usual standards of the search for truth in our system of justice as to call for the exercise of this Court's power of supervision.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, a writ of certiorari should issue.

APPENDIX A

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS

No. 7175

BEINE J. BURRELL, a/k/a Ronald B. Burrell, APPELLANT,

v.

UNITED STATES, APPELLEE.

Judgment entered this date

Appeal from the Superior Court of the District of Columbia

(Argued October 16, 1973 Decided January 30, 1975)

George F. Bason, Jr., appointed by this court, for appellant.

Joseph B. Valder, Assistant United States Attorney, with whom Harold H. Titus, Jr., United States Attorney, and John A. Terry, Assistant United States Attorney, were on the brief, for appellee.

Before NEBEKER, YEAGLEY and HARRIS, Associate Judges.

YEAGLEY, Associate Judge: This appeal follows a denial of appellant's pro se motion under Super. Ct. Cr. R. 35 for reduction of sentence, which was acted upon by the trial court without the appointment of counsel. The motion was filed after we granted appellant's motion to dismiss his appeal from the conviction of possessing a pistol without a license. Appellant had been sentenced to serve a term of from one to three years to run consecutively to an earlier sentence resulting from a felony conviction.

He alleged as reasons for granting the instant motion that his superiors and others in authority at Lorton Reformatory are satisfied that he is rehabilitated and ready for release; that having served in excess of 40 months of his previous sentence he is eligible for work release or parole; that a neighborhood development center had made a work release job available to him in Washington, D.C.; that he is prevented from realizing the foregoing "only because his sentence in this case is to run consecutively to his previous sentence, therefore prompting a transfer to Lewisburg Penitentiary because of a Federal Sentence imposed." In his letter to the court clerk transmitting the motion he said, "I do not have a lawyer, and I would like to have a lawyer appointed to represent me for this Motion." The court, after reviewing the motion and the papers appended thereto and his presentence report, denied the motion without acceding to the request for appointment of counsel. We think the court acted correctly and affirm.

Appellant is not here questioning the court's action in denying the motion for a reduction of sentence. The sole issue raised on appeal is whether or not the court's failure to appoint counsel deprived him of his constitutional right to such representation at a critical stage of his prosecution.

Supreme Court decisions regarding an accused's right to counsel make it clear that appointment of counsel is required at every stage of a criminal proceeding where substantial rights of a criminal accused may be affected, from custodial interrogation through trial and appeal.

Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128 (1967). Here, however, appellant has already lost his liberty and his appeal has been dismissed. He asks that part of that liberty be restored.

This is not a situation where an indigent defendant needs legal representation to defend himself against governmental action; that is, it is not an action brought by the government against the defendant such as one to revoke probation[1] or to revoke his parole.[2] This proceeding resembles those only insofar as it likewise arose after trial, sentencing and appeal. It was initiated by one who had run the gamut of the adjudicatory process. Appellant here had the assistance of counsel at the sentencing stage, when both counsel and the appellant were accorded the right to speak. The sentence imposed was within the statutory limits. Furthermore, as we shall see, the motion did not present to the court an appropriate basis for reduction of sentence.

In the probation revocation case of Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973), the Supreme Court held that it was error for the court of appeals to hold that the State has a constitutional duty to provide indigents with counsel in all probation or parole revocation cases. Id. at 787. The Court apparently was of the view that frequently there would be little to be resolved at such a proceeding, noting that in most cases such a movant "has been convicted of committing another crime or has admitted the charges against him." Id. (Footnote omitted.) It said, "The need for counsel at revocation hearings derives, not from the invariable attributes of those hearings, but rather from the peculiarities of particular cases." Id. at 789. The Court held:

> We thus find no justification for a new inflexible constitutional rule with respect to the requirement of counsel. We think, rather, that the decision as to the need for counsel must be made on a case-by-case basis in the exercise of a sound discretion by the state authority charged with responsibility for administering the probation and parole system. . . . [T]here will remain certain cases in which fundamental fairness—the touchstone of due process—will require that the State provide at its expense counsel for indigent probationers or parolees. [Id. at 790.]

Although we are not faced with the motion of a probationer or parole violator, the problem we face is not entirely dissimilar. Further, we are not cited to any authority, and we know of none, holding that whenever one moves for a reduction of sentence he thereby becomes constitutionally entitled to counsel. It cannot be said that appellant has been deprived of a substantive right. There is no right to work release, which is the objective underlying his motion, any more than there is a right to a reduction of confinement time. Green v. United States, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 40, 481 F.2d 1140 (1973).

The matters alleged in the motion are not considerations relevant to sentencing [3] nor are they factors which would ordinarily be considered on a motion for reduction of sentence. The appellant's motion was based primarily on his alleged rehabilitation and good prison behavior. Such post-sentencing developments quite clearly represent the sort of factors that are more appropriately considerations for the Board of Parole in determining a prisoner's eligibility for parole. United States v. Maynard, 485 F.2d 247 (9th Cir. 1973); State v. Dunn, 282 A.2d 675 (N.H. 1971).

[3] The Policies and Standards for Sentencing adopted by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, July 8, 1960, 27 F.R.D. 390, provides:

> 3. A proper sentence is a composite of many factors, including the nature of the offense, the circumstances—extenuating or aggravating—of the offense, the prior criminal record, if any, of the offender, the age of the offender, the record of the offender as to employment, the background of the offender with reference to education, home life, sobriety and social adjustment, the emotional and mental condition of the offender, the prospects for the rehabilitation of the offender, the possibility of a return of the offender to a normal life in the community, the possibility of treatment or of training of the offender, the possibility that the sentence may serve as a deterrent to crime by this offender, or by others, and the current community need, if any, for such a deterrent in respect to the particular type of offense involved.

The question of whether the appellant had a statutory, as distinguished from a constitutional, right to counsel in this case under the Criminal Justice Act [4] was raised sua sponte by this court at oral argument. The pertinent statutory provision provides that:

> A person for whom counsel is appointed shall be represented at every stage of the proceedings from his initial appearance before the United States magistrate or the court through appeal, including ancillary matters appropriate to the proceedings. . . . [18 U.S.C. § 3006A(c) (1970).]

[4] 18 U.S.C. § 3006A (1970). The Criminal Justice Act is made expressly applicable in the District of Columbia in 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(l) (1970).

It is noted that this provision is for all practical purposes identical to section 2 of the District of Columbia Criminal Justice Act, Pub. L. No. 93-412, § 2 (September 3, 1974) (now codified as § 11-2603 of the D.C. Code). We do not construe § 3006A(c) to require the appointment of counsel to assist in the preparation of a post-appeal motion for a reduction of sentence. We agree with the court in Dirring v. United States, 353 F.2d 519, 520 (1st Cir. 1965), that "[a]fter final conviction the appointment of counsel must rest in the discretion of the court."

Nor do we find that the law in this regard was changed when Congress amended § 3006A(c) in 1970 by adding the phrase "including ancillary matters appropriate to the proceedings." The legislative history of this amendment indicates that it was not intended to change existing law, but rather to clarify it and insure that compensation was available to appointed counsel for remedies technically outside the scope of the trial such as habeas corpus ad testificandum and mental competency hearings.[5] There is no indication that the amendment was intended to create a statutory right to counsel to aid in the filing of motions after final conviction.[6] The appointment of [5] 2 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 3989 (1970). We also note in this regard that the trial court in Green v. United States, supra, denied the pro se motions for reduction of sentence filed by two prison inmates. The Circuit Court subsequently denied the pro se motions for leave to proceed on appeal in forma pauperis filed by both inmates. No mention was made in that case of a statutory right to counsel under amended § 3006A(c).

[6] This decision is not meant to affect any right appointed counsel may have to claim compensation under the Criminal Justice Act for motions filed after final conviction on behalf of one's client.

counsel in these instances is a matter within the sound discretion of the court.

We think that an indigent's right to appointed counsel for a reduction of sentence motion should be restricted by the trial court to situations raising the kind of an issue, supported by specific factual allegations, wherein fundamental fairness requires the appointment of counsel if standards of due process are to be met. No such issue is raised here. Accordingly we hold that 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(c) (1970) does not require that counsel be appointed upon the defendant's request before the court can determine the substance of a Rule 35 motion which is filed after final conviction and that the motion before the trial court in this case, being patently deficient, did not present the sort of an issue requiring the appointment of counsel. No other issue being raised by this appeal, the order is

APPENDIX B

Constitution of the United States, Fifth Amendment:

> "No person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . ."

Constitution of the United States, Sixth Amendment:

> "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence."

18 U.S.C. 3006A (c):

> "A person for whom counsel is appointed shall be represented at every stage of the proceedings from his initial appearance before the United States magistrate or the court through appeal, including ancillary matters appropriate to the proceedings . . . ."

18 U.S.C. 3006A (d):

> ". . . . For representation in connection with a post-trial motion made after the entry of judgment or in a probation revocation proceeding or for representation provided under subsection (g) the compensation shall not exceed $250 for each attorney in each proceeding in each court."

Rule 35(a), D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rules (identical to Federal Criminal Rule 35):

> "The court may correct an illegal sentence at any time and may correct a sentence imposed in an illegal manner within the time provided herein for the reduction of sentence. The court may reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, or within 120 days after receipt by the court of a mandate issued upon affirmance of the judgment or dismissal of the appeal, or within 120 days after entry of any order or judgment of the Supreme Court denying review of, or having the effect of upholding, a judgment of conviction. The court may also reduce a sentence upon revocation of probation as provided by law."

Rule 44, D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rules (identical to Federal Criminal Rule 44(a) except for the omission of the bracketed matter below):
